Title of Dissertation (日英)	Political Institutions, Actors, Attitudes, and the Relationship to Political Participation on The Local Level: An Oita Case Study (地方政治における構造、アクター、態度、参画—大分市の事例)
Examiners	(Supervisor) SATO Yoichiro	YAMAGAMI Susumu
	ASANO Masahiko (Takushoku University)
Summary of Dissertation Contents	This dissertation examines the ways citizens participate politically in a small rural Japanese city. It specifically addresses how citizens attempt to exact change and/or influence policy; how the government/bureaucracy engages citizens in political participation; and the relationship between citizens' attitudes towards government and political participation. Using political participation theories, this study examines three modes of participation: attending town meetings, campaigning and contacting public officials. The study employs a mixed method, combining three qualitative case studies with a quantitative survey. The study finds that (1) participation is dictated by political intermediaries who create disincentives for more independent forms of political participation, (2) citizens who participate politically have higher levels of perceived efficacy and a lower perception of government corruption and (3) the participatory mechanisms in place on the local level do not equally engage all citizens.
